

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

October 11, 2016

The great American experiment in self-governance relies on the work of all our people to give it life and shape its destiny. Recognizing the need for citizens to participate in our democracy, President Lyndon B. Johnson launched the White House Fellows Program over half a century ago—and ever since, it has embodied the shared sense of civic responsibility that lies at the heart of our Republic.

From climate change and national security to transportation and energy, White House Fellows will be tasked with addressing some of the most pressing issues of our time. Serving at the highest levels of Government, Fellows are part of a long line of public servants who play a unique and powerful role in sustaining our Nation.

In order to bridge the gap between the promise of our ideals and the realities of our time, we need creative and innovative thinkers of all backgrounds to harness their potential, reimagine our country the way it should be, and bring bold visions to life. Each of us has the power to alter America's course, and we hope you'll consider applying to the White House Fellows Program to be that force for change.

 Michelle Obama